The apparent increase in incidence of acute myocardial infarction (AMI) in recent years has also been noted at our institution during a similar time period. To determine whether this reflects an actual increase in the incidence of AMI, we compared patient characteristics, the angiographic incidence of coronary lesions, and the 12-month survival of patients presenting with AMI in this institution in the 1970s (before the introduction of primary angioplasty) to those from the 1990s (after the introduction of primary angioplasty). A retrospective analysis of our registry identified 204 patients with AMI from the 1970s and 884 patients from the 1990s. In the 1970s, patients were more likely to present with anterior infarctions (43.6% vs 26.1%,  $P = .015$ ) and with normal or near-normal total creatine kinase (26.6% vs 3.0%,  $P = 6d1f23a050$ )
